

Ljiljana Poljak Bilić graduated from the Department of Information Sciences in 2016. After finishing her studies, she worked in the Department for Research and Development at the University Library in Split and actively participated in various university projects. She enrolled as a Ph.D. student in the postgraduate doctoral study program Knowledge Society and Information Transfer in 2020. She has been employed as a research assistant at the Department of Information Sciences at the University of Zadar since 2023.

She is involved in teaching at the undergraduate level, where she participates in the course Organization and Management of Information Institutions and graduate studies, in the courses Management of Information Institutions, Management of Information Collections, Evaluation of Information Institutions, and Open Science. Her responsibilities also include coordinating practice work at all levels of study.

Her research and teaching interests focus on management, evaluation, and planning in information institutions and open science and research data.